MARKET OVERVIEW

For the fourth quarter of 2016, international equities posted modest losses in U.S. dollar terms, with the MSCI EAFE Index down 0.7%. Returns were hindered by a sharp rise in the dollar against most other currencies following the unexpected U.S. election results. The Japanese yen was one of the largest decliners, down 13.2% as the yield spread between U.S. and Japanese bonds widened; the Bank of Japan (BOJ) is seeking to keep rates flat at about zero, while U.S. Treasury rates are on the rise. Emerging market currencies also declined significantly against the dollar on concerns about potential U.S. trade protectionism under the incoming administration. The Federal Reserve Bank's more aggressive rate-hike rhetoric at its December meeting further fueled the dollar's rise.

In their local markets, international equity returns looked more encouraging. Taking currency movements out of the equation, the MSCI EAFE would have returned 7.1% for the quarter. European equities generally posted solid returns, with investors welcoming the European Central Bank's December announcement that it would extend its quantitative easing program, while lowering its monthly asset purchases. Eurozone consumer confidence improved to its strongest reading since April 2015, while retail sales grew at their fastest rate in two years and inflation accelerated. French stocks outperformed on news that the economy grew 0.2% in the third quarter, rebounding from a 0.1% contraction the previous quarter, and manufacturing activity continued to increase. Stocks also performed well in Germany, where business confidence and factory orders grew, driven by a rebound in domestic demand. In October, a slower pace of growth in UK home prices added to growing concerns that the housing market is slowing in the wake of the "Brexit" referendum.

Stocks rallied in the Asia-Pacific region, particularly in Japan thanks to support from the weaker yen and the BOJ's continued accommodative monetary policy stance. Australian equities also gained on the prospects for deflation, shrugging off a contraction in third-quarter real GDP growth. Stocks in Hong Kong fell amid a continuing decline in retail sales, with sentiment further impacted by rising U.S. interest rates and concerns over capital controls in China.

Performance was generally worse in emerging markets, as U.S. trade protectionism fears and the prospect of tighter U.S. dollar-liquidity dampened sentiment. China was particularly hard hit, with export-dependent sectors faring the worst.

FUND PERFORMANCE

For the quarter, the Fund's Class A shares declined 0.94% (without load), underperforming the MSCI EAFE Index, which declined 0.68%. Security selection made an overall positive contribution to relative performance, with strong selection in the consumer staples, materials, real estate and information technology sectors compensating for weaker selection in the consumer discretionary and energy sectors. Sector allocation made a modestly negative contribution to relative returns. The Fund benefitted from its underweight to consumer staples, healthcare and utilities, but this was offset by its exposure to other sectors, primarily its underweight to energy and overweight to real estate.

Security selection was particularly strong in France and Japan. In Europe, poor selection in the UK and Germany was more than offset by stronger selection in France, the Netherlands, Switzerland and Norway. The Fund's out-of-benchmark emerging-market positions were an overall detriment to relative performance, particularly due to weak performance in Turkey and China.

The top contributor to relative performance was Norwegian aluminum and hydroelectric power company Norsk Hydro, which returned

Class A Shares

11.3% after reporting strong third-quarter results driven by higher aluminum prices, which offset seasonal weakness and currency headwinds, and higher-than-expected production and cost improvements in bauxite and alumina. The company stated that it expects global aluminum demand growth to land in the higher end of its forecasted range due to strong demand in China.

Other top contributors included banking and financial services group ING, the largest Dutch lender, which rose 14.2% after reporting better-than-expected earnings growth for the third quarter, driven by investment gains, increasing deposits, and progress on cost savings. French-Italian electronics and semiconductor manufacturer STMicroelectronics gained more than 35%, as strong third-quarter results and fourth-quarter outlook demonstrated continued progress on sales growth and margin improvement. The company states it is benefitting from strong demand in the smartphone market and increasing use of chips in sensors in everything from connected cars to smart lighting fixtures. French insurance firm AXA also made a strong positive contribution, returning 8.5% during the period it was held by the Fund. AXA expects increasing U.S. long-term interest rates and the stronger U.S. dollar to benefit its balance sheet and earnings over the next year.

The Fund also benefitted from not owning benchmark-holding Nestlé, the Swiss food and beverage company, which declined 9.0% amid slowing revenue growth due to weakness in emerging markets and deflation in Europe. Nestlé is not approved for investment by the Domini Funds primarily due to its leading role in the infant formula and bottled water industries, and related concerns.

The largest detractor from relative performance was Danish wind-turbine manufacturer Vestas Wind Systems, which declined 20.9%. Despite reporting solid third-quarter results, management announced that it expects lower activity in fiscal-year 2017 in the U.S., where election results added to worries around potential negative changes to wind-power regulations.

A number of other large detractors came from the UK, where investor sentiment remains more subdued following the EU “Brexit” referendum. Despite reporting solid third-quarter sales, with strength in the UK and Poland offsetting weakness in France, home-improvement retailer Kingfisher declined 10.9% for the quarter. UK-based telecommunications group Vodafone declined 12.5% after announcing that it was taking a significant write-down on the value of its Indian unit. A recent mobile startup launched by India’s richest man, Mukesh Ambani, has upended the Indian telecommunications market with a free voice and data promotion that has created much uncertainty and forced Vodafone to delay plans for an initial public offering that would spin the unit off.

Japanese mobile app developer COLOPL, a non-benchmark holding, was another significant detractor, declining 44.8%. The company is forecasting a significant profit decline for the fiscal year, with sales for existing apps expected to gradually drop off while the company pivots its focus to the budding virtual-reality (VR) market.

The Fund’s relative performance was also dampened by not owning Anglo-Dutch multinational oil and gas company Royal Dutch Shell, a benchmark holding that gained 13.8% for the quarter.
